Iran/Polyethylene Quick Scenarios

Investors are asking about the potential impacts to global polyethylene markets from the conflict in Iran. We provide some framework thoughts below.

The first order impacts are clear to all by now: higher oil prices increase the cost of production for naphtha based producers, but may or may not lead to immediately higher PE prices depending on local PE S&D. Likewise, the impact to/from plant operating expenses as higher TTF/JKM benchmark natural gas prices flow through to power/electricity costs.

Thereafter, a range of potential outcomes present themselves, most of which we believe are dependent on the extent of any: i) production curtailments in Iran (possible in the next week or so if the conflict continues, according to trade sources; Iran is ~6% of global PE capacity); ii) damage to Iranian facilities (remains to be seen if at all and to what extent); iii) logistical challenges and higher freight costs for all Middle East exporters, including Iran (already happening at material increments and note that ME production represents ~15% of global demand); and/or iv) production responses from other regions (there is about as much excess capacity), though this may require higher prices to necessitate action, particularly in Europe.

Cost-advantaged US producers may also take a wait and see approach on both the duration of the conflict and any near-term price response (i.e., the US March contract price) before increasing operating rates and risk an inventory build that could hurt pricing efforts in future months should the conflict abate.

It also remains to be seen how buyers will respond - do they view this as a time to load up on inventory in anticipation of higher prices, or a time to revert to more hand to mouth purchasing while prices spike temporarily and consumers get pinched by higher gasoline prices at the pump?

Net, we are not all that surprised by the limited/mixed equity response today to Dow, LyondellBasell and - to a lesser extent - Westlake shares as the equity market may view the Iran conflict as a geopolitical unplanned outage rather than a more structural change to the S&D (i.e., that is how we see it at this point). The limited share price response may also reflect the significant YTD rally in the commodity chemicals sub-sector (i.e., clearly, improving economics have already been priced in, though this is unlikely, in our view, the path the market envisioned). To this end, we note the larger share price response at nitrogen producer CF, where nitrogen product prices have already spiked materially ahead of the recent escalation in Iran, but we believe this reflects the materially tighter nitrogen/urea S&D and the more spot oriented nature of the urea trade.
